The price cap is set by Ofgem, the energy regulator. It affects the way energy suppliers can price their variable energy tariffs. The cap puts a limit on how much customers pay for each unit of gas and electricity. It also sets a maximum standing charge - this is used to cover the cost of things like maintenance of pipes and meters.

It's based on the price of wholesale energy. The cap gets reviewed 4 times a year, with price changes taking place in January, April, July and October.

This is a cost that's paid by everyone who has an energy account in the UK - whether their home is using any energy or not. It's used to pay for things like the maintenance of pipes, power lines, and meters.

It's based on various costs that energy suppliers face, with wholesale energy being the biggest element. Since wholesale prices change frequently, the price cap gets updated every three months. Other costs include things like maintenance of pipes and meters, and meeting environmental and social policy obligations.

Yes, we are. You can get a free annual boiler service if you choose a fixed-rate tariff³, and your rates will stay the same until the end of your contract.
